Smoking. Madame de Sevigné is still laughed at for having prophesied that coffee would go out of fashion. Perhaps at this time, when tobacco brings a revenue of £3,000,000 to the exchequer, it would be hazardous to predict that smoking will ever fall into disuse. Yet it must be remembered that in the last century snuff-taking was universal, and the came to this town only November last, that it has now diminished to such an extent that the eight of a snuff-box in an old gentleman's hands has become a rarity, while no young man would venture to sport such a thing in society. Snuff-taking began to decline when ladies, after trying it themselves, had the courage to declare it an unclean habit; and a time may well come when they will set their faces once more against smoking, or at all events insist that it should be indulged in with more moderation than at present. Men are now smoking to excess, which is possibly a reaction on the social persecutions with which tobacco was so long visited. Not to talk of Sultan Amurath IV., who sentenced smokers to death, and of James I., who wrote his "Counterblast" against men "who made chimneys of their mouths," one has only to recall the not very distant days when a gentleman was held in very evil odor who entered a drawing-room with a perfume of tobacco hanging about his clothes. It is but very recently that monarchs and statesmen have begun to use cigars. Napoleon III. set the fashion in France, and puffed cigarettes at Cabinet councils; but neither M. Thiers nor M. Guizot ever smoked. In England, the late Lord Clarendon was, we believe, the first Minister who was a great habitual smoker, but his example has not been followed by Lord Benconsfield or Mr. Gladstone. Prince Bismarck, on the other hand, transacts most of his official business with a cigar in his mouth; and in the Memoirs of Herr Maurice Busch, his late secretary, may be found a characteristic anecdote of how this Prussian statesman claimed and enforced his privilege of smoking at the sittings of the Military Commission of the Diet at Frankfort. The story is given in the Chancellor's words: While Rochow represented Prussia at the Diet, Count Rechberg, the president, who represented Austria, was the only member who smoked at the beard. Rochow, who was a great smoker, had often longed to light a cigar, but did not dare. When I arrived, however, I asked myself why Prussia should not do as Austria did? So at the first sitting I drew out a cigar and asked Rechberg for a light, which he gave me, stupefied at my coolness. The other delegates were not less amazed, and wrote to their respective Governments for instructions; but the subject was a serious one, requiring reflection; so six months elapsed without their obtaining an answer. Meanwhile Bothmer, the Hanoverian, who was a great friend of Rechberg, took the liberty of lighting up to be even with me, seeing which the Saxon Nostitz produced a cigar to stand equal with him. There remained now only the delegates of Wurtenberg and Darmstadt; but these two were not smokers. What was to be done? Could moderate in his use of alcoholic drinks. their faces without blowing back? The which, in the correspondent's opinion, Wurtenberger was the first to decide that the honor of his country was involved, and he brought out a cigar in his turn. I think I can see it now-an undefinable cigar, pale-yellow, thin, tapering, and enormously might, and almost to the stump, thus giving to be conducive to his health and longevity.

It clouds in ailway carriages, cafés, billiardness too. Already the ladies of Turkey, Russia, Spain, and Hungary smoke cigarettes; and indeed in Hungary and the Danubian countries it is not rare to find cigars by their own firesides with apparent self-defence. Try any male non-smoker in a railway carriage where half a dozen other men are smoking, or turn him into a German brauerei, where fifty students are pulling pipes, and see how soon he craves for fresh air. Add to this that even a smoker often finds the smoking of other men disagreeable, whilst all men dislike that rank smell of stale tobacco which hangs about a room which was smoked in over night. How much more, then, must ladies born blind never smoke, which would seem the weed, seeing its fumes curl, and knock- the form of a prayer." ing away the ashes. One may go further, and say that with many persons smoking is simply a habit, which yields no definite enjoyment, but helps to make the time pass and gives the bands something to do. Certainly to a man who smokes in moderation an occasional cigar or pipe is highly pleasurable. But what of the third, fourth, fifth eigar or pipe? When the palate is cloyed; when clothes, hair, and mind are saturated with the fumes of nicotine; when the air in the room is as thick as a river-fog; and when the man with the weed has puffed himself into a drowsy state, in which he is unfit for work and can only talk in monosyllables-then the pleasure of smoking is a mere delusion. It is only the pleasure of being idle. If ever English women take to smoking, led to ponder sorrowfully on the nuisance of excessive smoking. Meanwhile it should be owned that men who are always smoking, and who expect ladies to like their company, are not reasonable. What would be thought of a woman who spent most of her time coloring meerschaums in her boudoir, knowing that her husband loathed tobacco? Or, to take another case, which will put the subject in a new of reversing this normal order of things light: supposing a lady were possessed of and causing surrounding objects to recede an immoderate passion for the perfume is liable to affect injuriously the developof garlic, and were to carry bulbs of this esculent in her pocket, to be peeled and nibbled whenever she had a spare half-hour; and supposing this delightful fashion to become general among the fair sex, so that in railway carrisges and parks maids and matrons were constantly to be seen shredding the pun-gent vegetable, and declaring that the tears which it brought to their eyes did them riages and parks maids and matrons were constantly to be seen shredding the pungent vegetable, and declaring that the tears which it brought to their cycs did them good, that it enlivened them, soothed their nerves, and so forth! Fancy men using entry, imprecations—in vain against this fashion, and being aline was quicker than thought, said: "I know something that it, upday against this fashion, and being aline was quicker than thought," "What is it, Johnny," asked up our garlie when you discard your to-bacco." DEATH OF WILLIAM CAMPBELL, THE HEAVIEST MAN IN THE WORLD. . The Newcastle Chronicle gives the following interesting particulars of the death of Mr. William Campbell, landlord of the Duke-of-Wellington public house, High Bridge, Newcastle, and widely known as the Scottish giant, who died at that establishment on May 26: He had been ill about ten days, the cause of death, it is supposed, being congestion of the lungs, the result of a cold caught during his absence from home. The deceased was a little more than twenty-two years of age, having been born in Giasgow on the 2d of April, 1856. soon found publicity, attracted crowds of visitors to the levees which he regularly held in his newly-acquired house. Campbell was one of a family of seven children, none of whom beside himself are of more than ordinary proportions. His father, who for many years was manager of Tennant's chemical-works, in the city of his birth, was of average weight, although he stood six fect two inches high, while his mother was rather under the usual weight of women. From his birth William Campbell showed a remarkable disposition toward stoutness. At nine months old, according to his own statement, published in the form of an auto-biographical pamphlet, he weighed fifty-six pounds, which, at ten years of age, had increased to 252 pounds. and his bodily size continued to develope until, immediately before his indisposition, it had attained the following marvellous measurements: Ninety-six inches round the shoulders, seventy-six inches round the chest, forty-seven inches round the thigh, and thirty-five inches round the calf of the leg. He weighed 727 pounds, and stood in his stockings five feet three and a half inches high; none of these startling dimensions having been appreciably diminished during the illness which has ended in his death. Campbell, we learn, was brought up as a printer, but was compelled from his huge size to give up that occupation, to which be had become much attached. The deceased was particularly solicitous it should not be inferred that his unusual proportions were attributable to his mode of living, for he took exercise regularly and subsisted on only ordinary fare. He boasted of being "the largest subject in her Majesty's realms," and some conception of his claim to this may be gathered from the fact that it required more cloth for his one suit of clothes than it took for three ordinary men. Campbell, before settling in Newcastle, had travelled very extensively, visited all the principal places in England, Ireland, Scotland, Wales, and France, and being seen in turn by many millions of people. About the beginning of the present year the deceased was visited, at the request of the Duke of Wellington, by a local medical gentleman, who, detailing his observations in the Lancet, stated that he they let their colleagues blow clouds in He admitted that he was a great smoker, long.
